From: Robert Frame
To: HSSframework
Subject: I affirm the revisions proposed in the Making the Framework FAIR report
Date: Wednesday, November 19, 2014 9:44:29 AM

Bill Honig and Nancy McTygue, Co-Chairs
History-Social Science Subject Matter Committee
Instructional Quality Commission
1430 N Street, Suite #5111
Sacramento, CA 95814
Email: hssframework@cde.ca.gov

RE: 2014-2015 History-Social Science Framework Update, FAIR Education Act

Dear Co-Chairs Honig and McTygue:

As a professor of American history, including a course in LGBT history, at a community college, I believe students only benefit when the representations and contributions of LGBT individuals are accurate and inclusive. You can help ensure this benefit goes to students under your charge by truly bringing the History-Social Science Framework into compliance with SB 48, the FAIR Education Act. The current draft of the History-Social Science Framework under review by the Instructional Quality Commission does not meet the law's requirements or intent. Rather, it tokenizes LGBT history. That approach robs students of the benefit a true commitment to the legislation's intent can yield

To comply with SB 48, the Framework should include lesbian, bisexual, and transgender Americans as well as gay men. The Framework's LGBT inclusion requires diverse portrayals, particularly LGBT people of color, to accurately reflect California and U.S. history and prepare students to live in today's world. The Framework also needs more robust coverage of diverse LGBT people and historical events in order to provide local districts and classroom teachers with sufficient guidance about historically accurate and age-appropriate content to include throughout elementary school, middle school, and high school.

To provide for robust and comprehensive inclusion, I endorse the recommended changes in Making the Framework FAIR, a report submitted to IQC by the Committee on LGBT History, an affiliated group of the American Historical Association. The report was developed by 20 of the country's leading scholars of LGBT history and they produced scholarship-supported recommendations with suggested resources for teachers.

I endorse the transformative approach to teaching LGBT-inclusive history as described in Making the Framework FAIR report. Through showing change over time within the long sweep of U.S. history, a transformative Framework will empower students with flexible analytical skills for understanding and contextualizing how gender and sexuality shape contemporary politics and policy, culture, and society.

While all changes Making the Framework FAIR calls for are important and well supported by scholarly and pedagogical rationales, the revised Framework must address:

1. Grade 2: LGBT families in the context of understanding family diversity as a contemporary and historical reality
2. Grade 4: Central roles played by gender and sexual orientation in California's history as a site of rich, contested, and changing diversity. This should cover, at a minimum, the historical role of two-spirit people in Native Californian tribes and the related influence of colonization, a discussion of gender role diversity during the Gold Rush, and the state's unique role in the development of LGBT civil rights.

3. Grade 5: Variation over time, region, and culture in colonial American practices and laws with regard to gender and relationships
4. Grade 8: Fundamental transformations in gender and sexuality in conjunction with nineteenth-century urbanization, industrialization, and expansionism. This should cover, at a minimum, diverse social relations among men, as exemplified by the poetry of Walt Whitman, and among women in "Boston Marriages," as well as alternative family structures including same-sex relationships within enslaved and post-Emancipation communities and Native American communities.
5. Grade 11: The evolution of modern LGBT communities and identities from the emergence of LGBT urban subcultures, including gender and sexual diversity in the Harlem Renaissance through the late 20th century as well as the development of twentieth-century persecution of sexual and gender minorities and the growth of the LGBT civil rights movement. The latter need be represented by, at a minimum: WWII persecution of LGBT service members leading into the Lavender Scare; Bayard Rustin's role in the African American civil rights movement; early LGBT political leaders (including Harry Hay, José Sarria, Del Martin and Phyllis Lyon, Frank Kameny, Sylvia Rivera, and Harvey Milk); and the advance of civil rights protections, including declassifying of homosexuality as a mental illness stemming from homophile, gay liberation, and feminist movements. The Framework should also underscore historical precedents for contemporary LGBT political issues, including responses to the AIDS epidemic, the right to marry, protections for transgender people, immigration, and the role of LGBT people in the military.

As one whose training as an historian focused on the histories of sexuality and gender, I understand that incorporating these areas of analysis can deepen students' understanding of American history more generally: these fields augment and make richer more traditional areas of study. Bottom line: their inclusion helps students learn better. As a citizen of the United States, I also understand that the more comprehensive our grounding in the history of our country, the more fully engaged, informed, and thoughtful we can be as citizens. I encourage, indeed implore, you to add to this process of deeper citizenship by following the intent of the FAIR Education Act by fully incorporating LGBT historical topics across your curriculum.

The FAIR Education Act also has another very important aspect: It seeks to provide California students with a full and accurate understanding of the role of LGBT Americans in our history, which will promote an atmosphere of safety and respect in California schools. I strongly support the legislation's goal of supporting all students through fostering an environment in which they can focus on learning. Should you have any questions regarding my recommendation for full implementation of the FAIR Education Act in the History-Social Science Framework, please contact me at the email address below.

Sincerely,

Robert Frame
History Faculty | Normandale Community College
952-358-8889 | www.normandale.edu
robert.frame@normandale.edu

NORMANDALE
COMMUNITY COLLEGE